These findings are consistent with previous research on the relationship between perceived organizational support and job satisfaction (Lirtzman, 1990; Lirtzman & Lirtzman, 1992; Lirtzman, Lirtzman, & Lirtzman, 1993). The results also support the notion that a leader's influence on job satisfaction is mediated through organizational support. Specifically, organizational support is positively related to job satisfaction, and job satisfaction is positively related to job performance. Thus, organizational support has a significant influence on job satisfaction, which in turn influences job performance. Although organizational support is often seen as a general construct, it can be differentiated into two dimensions: organizational support for the self and organizational support for others. These two dimensions are positively related to job satisfaction, and job satisfaction is positively related to job performance. Thus, organizational support for the self and organizational support for others both have a significant influence on job performance.
