Risk Modeling in Agriculture Arne Hallam,1994 Development of Risk Communication Tools for Occupational Exposures ,2022 Work can be dangerous Employees in industrial and maintenance related occupations are often confronted with a broad array of workplace risks These can be direct risks employees could be at risk of falling losing limbs due to machinery or explosions or they could be exposed to toxic gases or noise However in some cases they are also exposed to not directly perceptible exposure risks that may primarily cause long term effects This dissertation focuses on the latter category of risks The reason is that these risks are often neglected compared to direct risks and perceptible exposures which are often significantly more salient Specifically two not directly perceptible exposure risks are selected which are particulate matter PM and electromagnetic fields EMF In many branches work safety is already notably under the attention For example the Netherlands mandates periodical work safety meetings in several branches where employees are regularly instructed about safety related subjects The question remains however if the current methods of risk communication are sufficiently effective Long term effects due to exposure in the workplace are still commonplace and safety regulations aimed to combat this do not always lead to compliance Risk communication should aim therefore not only to improve knowledge and attitudes concerning a certain subject but also to improve safety by changing behavior in the workplace In this dissertation we investigated to what extent this behavioral change is needed concerning both of the selected exposure risks For this goal we used the mental models approach where employees perceptions are systematically compared to expert views concerning the aforementioned risks We also gave attention to the current methods of risk mitigation and the way risk communication is currently handled both inside and outside the mandated periodical work safety meetings
