

Road Sensing Suspension System

General Description

A continuously variable road sensing suspension (CVRSS) system adjusts shock absorber and strut damping in relation to road and driving conditions.

The powertrain control module (PCM) is a computer that controls such output functions as electronic fuel injection, spark advance, emission devices, and transaxle shifting.

A wheel position sensor sends a voltage signal to the control module in relation to the amount and velocity of vertical wheel movement.

The continuously variable road sensing suspension (CVRSS) system is referred to as a real time damping (RTD) system in the onboard diagnostics.

The CVRSS controls damping forces in the front struts and rear shock absorbers in response to various road and driving conditions. The CVRSS system changes shock and strut damping forces in 10 to 12 milliseconds, whereas other suspension damping systems require a much longer time interval to change damping forces. It requires about 200 milliseconds to blink your eye. This gives us some idea how quickly the CVRSS system reacts.

The CVRSS module receives inputs regarding vertical acceleration, wheel-to-body position, speed of wheel movement, vehicle speed, and lift/dive (Figure 8-45). The CVRSS module evaluates these inputs and controls a solenoid in each shock or strut to provide suspension damping control. The solenoids in the shocks and struts can react much faster compared with the strut actuators explained previously in some systems.

The CVRSS module also controls the speed dependent steering system called MagnaSteer® and the electronic level control (ELC). This MagnaSteer® system is similar to the electronic variable orifice (EVO) steering explained in Chapter 12 under conventional and electronic rack and pinion steering gears.

Inputs

Position Sensors. A wheel position sensor is mounted at each corner of the vehicle between a control arm and the chassis (Figures 8-46 and 8-47). These sensor inputs provide analog voltage signals to the CVRSS module regarding relative wheel-to-body movement and the velocity of wheel movement (Figure 8-48). The rear position sensor inputs also provide rear suspension height information to the CVRSS module, and this information is used by the module to control the rear suspension trim height. All four position sensors have the same design.
