

Both Karpman and Shostak have written about the politics of being Indian and perceive it's inextricably linked with the nation. "There is no such thing as an Indian person," according to Shostak, "but there are the representations of Indians that are used to construct the Indian person." According to Karpman, the "representational discourses" which identify, construct, and maintain all the institutionalized Indian identities, "are not to be taken at face value." These "representational discourses" have been used to construct and maintain the Indian person, and the Indian person is not to be taken at face value.
