the early days of horology the apprentice was taught the art of making a complete watch Production was slow very few duplicate watches were constructed and it was necessary that extra material be made individually by hand in the same way that the original part was produced As time passed the value of the repairer was indicated by his ability to make new parts and to replace them so that the watch would again be in running condition This was the prevailing situation for many years and the repairer was judged according to his skill in making and finishing the various parts A similar method of judging ability is still in force among some employers although the development of the industry into machine and specialized work has made many changes in regard to the most important duties of the repairer It is no longer necessary for him to know how to make a complete watch and only on occasional instances is it necessary for him to make a part Genuine material for modern watches is supplied by the manufacturer at less expense than it can be produced by the individual and in this particular branch of the work the repairers requirements have been very considerably curtailed A more exacting and a higher standard of timekeeping has developed however and in this field the requirements of the watchmaker have increased to the extent that it is no longer sufficient to merely restore a good watch to running condition It must keep time This development has grown gradually and surely and the past twenty five years may be assumed as the period of greatest advance It has been made possible by scientific and practical refinements which permit the adjustment of watches so that they will keep time within closely defined allowances under varying conditions About the Publisher Forgotten Books publishes hundreds of thousands of rare and classic books Find more at www.forgottenbooks.com This book is a reproduction of an important historical work Forgotten Books uses state of the art technology to digitally reconstruct the work preserving the original format whilst repairing imperfections present in the aged copy In rare cases an imperfection in the original such as a blemish or missing page may be replicated in our edition We do however repair the vast majority of imperfections successfully any imperfections that remain are intentionally left to preserve the state of such historical works
